How did the Fund perform during the reporting period?

The Fund launched October 28, 2024 and generated a net return of -1.30% for the stub-period ending December 31, 2024. Comparatively, the MSCI World Index was down -0.03% for the period. Markets significantly pulled back during the month of December and the Fund's core sector exposures were broadly negative, offsetting gains made the month prior in November. Exposures to the consumer, financial, industrial and technology sectors all detracted from performance for the period on a mark-to-market basis, while exposure to the media/telecommunications sector was modestly positive. The investment manager sought to capitalize on the market's volatility during Fund's first two months to establish core position exposures in line with our intermediate-term investment horizon. These exposures include attractive, high discovery value opportunities in middle and lower-large capitalization companies across the fund's target industry verticals. These opportunities include industrial electrification/clean power, AI infrastructure, global alternative asset management, clean technology, sports/media franchise value and consumer facing opportunities in asset light lodging, value-for money retail and service businesses. The investment manager also believes the market environment for "self- help" opportunities should continue to improve as corporate action and deal-making expands. In this regard, the Fund added meaningful long exposure to two situations where the companies, leaders in their respective industries, announced scale acquisitions the investment manager expects to be accretive to forward earnings.
